 $\overset{\mathrm{provincie}}{ZUID}HOLLAND$

About this cycle route

This 43-km cycle route takes you on an historic journey through the jenever (gin) city of Schiedam and the green polders of Midden-Delfland. The starting point is Schiedam. From there, the route winds its way via Vlaardingen, Maassluis and Schipluiden through Midden-Delfland, before returning to the centre of Schiedam. There is also a shorter route option (28 km).

This booklet contains an outline map of the route and a detailed route description, which sets out various places of interests and travel tips. Details of handy stop-off-points, such as bicycle hire centres and cafés or restaurants, are listed at the back of the booklet. The Netherlands has a bicycle network of numbered junctions that can be used to plot a recreational cycle route. The junctions which are relevant for (parts of) this cycle route are outlined on the map in this booklet. Along parts of the route you can follow the signs corresponding to the junctions.

Starting point

The route starts from the tourist information centre (VVV) in Schiedam. Ample parking is available in Schiedam for visitors travelling by car, such as 'ABC Garage' on the Kreupelstraat, 'Nieuwe Passage' on the Koemarkt, or 'Stadserfgarage' on the Overschiessestraat.

Travelling by public transport

You can start the cycle route from the railway stations in Schiedam, Vlaardingen-Oost, Vlaardingen or Maassluis.

The windmill history of Schiedam

In the late 18th century, twenty windmills could be found in the city of Schiedam. Of those original twenty, only six remain today.

Windmills and jenever (gin)

The windmills are a tangible reminder of Schiedam's jenever-producing history. In the 18th and 19th century, these windmills ground grains for the four hundred distilleries, which distilled malt wine ('moutwijn' in Dutch) for the jenever industry. During this time, Schiedam became the leading centre for the production of jenever in the world. Restrictions on the import of alcohol from France enabled Schiedam to benefit from a growing demand for jenever. Furthermore, shipping agents and herring fisheries were looking for new revenue streams to help offset the strong decline in the herring industry. Jenever production proved an extremely lucrative venture, leading to the worldwide export of this Schiedam speciality.

The tallest windmills in the world

To catch as much wind as possible, the windmills were built to stand high above the city; this explains why the windmills of Schiedam became the tallest in the world.

Place of interest 1: Windmill De Walvisch ('the Whale')

Jenever distillers laid the first stone of De Walvisch on 16 June 1794. The windmill not only ground rye, malt and barley; in the early 1830s, it also processed magnesium for medicinal purposes, among others. The windmill owes its name to the Greenland whaling industry, which had its heyday at the end of the 18th century. Today, De Walvisch houses a shop, which sells genuine miller's flour that has been ground at the mill, as well as other baking products.

Opening times: Wed 12.00 - 17.00, Thurs and Fri 10.00 - 17.00, Sa 10.00 - 16.00

Place of interest 2: De Korenbeurs (corn exchange)

The grain trade in Schiedam flourished as a result of the burgeoning jenever industry. The old distilleries, warehouses and the Korenbeurs corn exchange stand as silent witnesses to these activities. In the Korenbeurs, grain, malt wine and alcohol (the main ingredients of jenever) were traded.

Reconstruction work on De Kameel (1715) began in 2008. It sustained severe structural damage during a storm in 1865, and was subsequently demolished after a fire. De Kameel served as a malt mill, and was also used as a sawmill for some years. A special feature of this windmill is its 'cave', which allowed ships to load and unload inside the windmill. The fully restored windmill will be put into use in 2011.

Place of interest 4: Museum windmill De Nieuwe Palmboom ('The New Palm Tree')

This windmill was built in 1781 as De Palmboom (The Palm Tree) and was reconstructed in 1993 after a fire in 1901, which all but destroyed the mill. De Palmboom was restored and renamed De Nieuwe Palmboom; since 1993, it has housed a museum. The museum provides an in-depth visual account of the windmill history of Schiedam, and explains the entire process, 'from Grain to Glass'.

Standing at a height of 33.3 meter, De Noord (1803) is the tallest windmill in the world. This former malt-grinding mill now houses a restaurant. Adjacent to De Noord is a traditional 'farmers' container', in which the residue of malt-wine, left after the first distillation, was stored. The residue was transported in closed barges to neighbouring farms, where it was used as feed for the farm animals.

Place of interest 6: Windmill De Vrijheid ('Freedom')

Windmill De Vrijheid was built in 1785 and has retained many of its original features. After undergoing extensive renovation, the mill is now fully equipped with three pairs of millstones. De Vrijheid was originally used to grind grain for the jenever distilleries; during the Second World War, it was used to grind peas and beans for the soup-kitchens. Along with De Walvisch and De Nieuwe Palmboom, De Vrijheid is still used today to grind grain.

Place of interest 7: Windmill De Drie Koornbloemen ('The Three Corn Flowers')

Windmill De Drie Koornbloemen was built in 1770. which makes it the oldest windmill in Schiedam, and the only one with an adjoining miller's house. Following the decline of jenever production in Schiedam, the windmill was put into use as a sawmill for mahogany wood, and also served as a rice mill. Later, the mill was also used to grind peas, maize and beans, for processing into animal feed. The windmill has even been used in the past to pulverise stones for a tiling company.

Long Live the Windmills!

The Province of Zuid-Holland has heralded 2011 as the 'Long Live the Windmills!' theme year. Zuid-Holland boasts the highest number of windmills in the Netherlands, around 228. Not only do the windmills typify the traditional Dutch polder landscape, they are also inextricably linked to the history of the province. The windmills of the 'green polders' of Zuid-Holland have been keeping our feet dry for centuries, and are at the heart of the hydraulic engineering projects for which the Dutch are famed throughout the world. In various cities, the windmills played an important role in international trade. They served as saw mills for the Dutch shipyards; they produced filted textiles for the broadcloth industry and milled grain to produce bread and malt wine. Today, the windmills on your cycling itinerary also have another purpose: some house museums that provide a glimpse into the everyday life of the miller. Others accommodate restaurants and shops, where you can enjoy a range of traditional delicacies made in and around the region.
